Excerpt: . . . plants and is another illustration of the gradual dissemination of species with habits which lend themselves readily to distribution through commercial agencies. Flies and other pests. The necessity of controlling these insects has been greatly emphasized by the extensive mobilization of troops, particularly as more than half of the deaths in armies during recent wars have resulted from diseases rather than from wounds. The almost constant demand for information relating to household insects had practically exhausted the edition of State Museum Bulletin 136 dealing with the Control of Flies and Other Household Insects, and with the above facts in mind an extended and almost entirely rewritten edition entitled Household and Camp Insects, was issued as State Museum Bulletin 194 and widely distributed among sanitary officers of the army as well as to those specially interested in work of this kind throughout the country. Insect...
