Not illustrated. 1851 Excerpt: .are generally in stripes, and sometimes shaded, like the rainbow, and the great effort of the manufacturer is to bring off the shades, from light to dark, almost imperceptibly; sometimes these carpets are made checked, and in squares, like a draught-board. Scotch carpeting is at the present time coming very much into vogue; it is called the three-piled imperial, and is reckoned to be but little inferior in texture, look and wear, to Brussels. Besides the carpets already mentioned, there is, also, Dutch carpeting, woven much in the same way as the plain Venetian, some of them being made with cow-hair. The making of carpets comprise many other branches of the arts and manufactures besides weaving. There is the spinning and dying of the yarn, and the proper method of preparing numerous articles used in the work; above all, there is the skill of the designer; but in this particular English and Scotch taste are sadly deficient, and Peter Parley would like to see his young friends try their hands at making a few patterns for carpets, which will be an exercise of taste, and do them no harm. Some years ago, the kaleidoscope was extensively employed in the art of designing carpet-patterns, and those of my readers who should happen to have an instrument of this kind will do well to obtain a few hints from it. And when I was fifteen years old, Then was he crowned king; All Brittain that was at an...
