The physical fatigue and the emotions of the day threw us into a sudden and deep sleep. When we awoke the swallows were chirping around our bed and picking from the ground the crumbs of our supper; and the sun, already high in the heaven, heated the fagots of leaves over our heads as if they had been in a furnace. We lay a long time stretched upon our fern leaves, lost in that peculiar state of a half sleep, in which the mental faculties perceive and think before the senses give one the courage to get up or move. We exchanged a few inarticulate words that were interrupted by long pauses and were lost in our dreams. The experiences of the previous day, the boat rolling under our feet, the angry sea, the inapproachable rocks of the coast, the face of Graziella looking out between the two shutters and in the light of the torch, -- all these visions flitted before us confusedly and without connection or appreciation. We were attracted from this drowsiness by the sobs and complaints of the old grandmother, who was talking to her husband inside of the house. The chimney, which ran through the terrace, brought us the sound of the voices, so that we could hear some words of the conversation. The poor woman was lamenting the loss of her jars, of the anchor, of the ropes that were almost new, and, above all, of the...
